

that the majority of South Carolinians—both male and female—want the option of single-gender education offered by The Citadel. But the federal government thinks it knows what's best for South Carolinians and is trying to destroy an outstanding educational environment that South Carolinians overwhelmingly support.

Tobacco regulation. The Food and Drug Administration is trampling on states' turf with its new proposals for regulating cigarettes and chewing tobacco. Perhaps its silliest demand is that all advertising label cigarettes as "a nicotine-delivery device." The fact is, Congress has not given the FDA power to regulate tobacco except in limited instances. Everything else is up to the states—at least, it's supposed to be. We know the laws in South Carolina, and we can enforce them without Washington's "help."

Garnishment of wages. The federal government is threatening to sue South Carolina for not complying with a federal law that authorizes the garnishment of wages of people who get behind on student loans. The problem is, the law contains no express provision applying its terms to state government. In fact, its language attempts to override state laws altogether. It provides no clear direction to state governments, but now we're faced with the possibility of defending South Carolina in a suit.

Motor Voter. South Carolina is one of seven states to challenge the "Motor Voter" law that allows people to register to vote when they obtain a driver's license. The issue is not easy and accessible registration; we already have that in place. The issues are the rights of sovereign states and unfunded federal mandates. The federal government demanded that South Carolina spend a million dollars to expand its voter registration program—without giving the state a dime. Then, when we began to implement the program, the Justice Department demanded that the state contact all the people who theoretically could have registered while we were in litigation. And it ordered a monthly report on our progress. This micro-management of state business by the federal government should be an outrage to all U.S. citizens.

In closing, the legislation you are proposing promises a meaningful solution to the federal government's continued disregard of the 10th Amendment. Count me in as an enthusiastic supporter of the bill, and let me know of anything I can do to promote its passage.

With kindest personal regards,

GENERAL,

HON. TED STEVENS,
U.S. Senator, Chairman, Committee on Governmental Affairs, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR STEVENS: As the Attorney General for the State of Hawaii, I am writing to express my strong support for the Tenth Amendment Enforcement Act of 1996 ("TAEA").

There have been far too many instances in which federal laws impede, interfere with, or nullify state legislative or administrative actions to the detriment of the interests of the people of Hawaii. This has occurred in large part because the federal courts have given much congressional legislation very broad preemptive scope, in many cases far beyond what it appears Congress itself intended. These preemption rulings have prevented the states from enforcing and implementing needed state policies in areas of traditional state concern, while at the same time failing to serve any significant federal interests.

In my fourteen month tenure as Attorney General of Hawaii, examples of important state policies which were frustrated by preemption rulings made by the federal courts include the striking down of Hawaii's employment disability discrimination laws as applied to airline pilots, see Aloha Islandair v. Tseu, Civ. No. 94-00937 (D. Haw. 1995), appeal filed, C.A. No. 95-16656 (9th Cir.), the overturning of state labor department discretion to bar preexisting condition limitations in state-wide employee health care plans, Foodland Super Market v. Hamada, Civ. No. 95-00537 (D. Haw. 1996), appeal filed (9th Cir.), and the nullification of a state law merely asking the State's two major newspapers, granted the privilege of doing business under a joint operating agreement with antitrust immunity, to turn over their tax returns to the state Attorney General, for subsequent disclosure to the United States Justice Department, in order to assess the economic consequences of, and the newspapers' continued need for, the antitrust immunity, see Hawaii Newspaper Agency v. Bronster, Civ. No. 95-00635 (D. Haw. 1996), appeal filed, C.A. No. 96-15142 (9th Cir.).

Enactment of the TAEA would be a significant step in reversing this disturbing trend, and would help restore state direction over areas of predominant, if not exclusive, state concern. Under the TAEA (Section 6), preemption would only occur when Congress has explicitly stated that a given area is preempted. This would curtail the potentially unlimited sweep of the "implied preemption" doctrine, and ideally result in a more narrowly construed "express preemption."

Although certain provisions of the TAEA may pose procedural difficulties, or raise some questions of interpretation, I support the overall effect of, and goals behind, the TAEA, and specifically endorse Section 6, which would do much to minimize unwarranted preemption of state actions. I would, however, broaden the language of Section 6(a) to clarify that federal law shall not preempt "State or local government law, ordinance, regulation, or action," unless the statute explicitly declares an intent to preempt. This should ensure that all types of state action, including, for example, state discretionary administrative actions not commanded by any rule or statute, are not preempted without express congressional statement of intent to do so.

Thank you for your support of these critical state interests.

Very truly yours,

MARGERY S. BRONSTER,

Re Tenth Amendment Enforcement Act

HON. TED STEVENS,
U.S. Senate, Hart Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR STEVENS: I am writing to express my strong support for the proposed Tenth Amendment Enforcement Act of 1996. The proposal is an important part of the continuing effort to return to the States matters which properly belong within their control.

Every state has a vast number of examples of federal laws and regulatory actions which have interfered with state powers and objectives. I will mention just a few examples from Colorado.

The federal government has been especially intrusive into state affairs in the area of the environment. The country faces many environmental problems, from our quality problems to hazardous waste cleanups. The states are diligently working to solve these problems, while taking into account local needs and concerns. Federal interference with state efforts often results in less protection to the environment and less experimentation by the states.

For example, in 1994, Colorado passed legislation which was intended to encourage businesses to perform voluntary audits of their environmental compliance and to promptly correct any violations found. In exchange for these voluntary efforts, state regulators will not impose penalties for the violations. This program, which will be of great benefit to the environment, is severely hampered by the federal Environmental Protection Agency's refusal to give the same assurances, that is, to refrain from prosecuting companies that voluntarily report and correct violations.

Another example of EPA hindering state efforts at experimentation concerns Colorado's attempts to put in place a unique water quality testing program. Colorado was one of the first states to attempt to employ a different biomonitoring test. Rather than encouraging these efforts, EPA continuously rejected Colorado's regulation implementing the program until the state rule was drafted to be word-for-word like a comparable federal regulation.

Another example in the area of the environment concerns air quality. Our state has been developing strategies to deal with air quality issues for years. But our problems and solutions are unique since Colorado is a high elevation state. A federal "one size fits all" approach does not work here. The Environmental Protection Agency's answer—a centralized emissions testing program—has created large implementation costs and reduced state flexibility in addressing pollution problems. Even though Colorado drivers will expend hundreds of millions of dollars in testing costs over the next few years, State officials have no practical alternatives if the program does not work or if better solutions are discovered.

Another example of federal intrusion into matters of state concern arose recently in Colorado with regard to the Medicaid program. As you know, Congress' 1993 change to the Hyde Amendment made federal funds available for abortions terminating pregnancies resulting from rape and incest, but did not require that States pay for any abortions. However, an official at the federal Health Care Financing Administration wrote a letter concluding that states must pay for the disputed abortions. Based solely upon this letter, and without any change in federal statutes or regulations, several federal appellate courts have required States to pay for these procedures, notwithstanding state laws to the contrary.

Colorado state officials are in an impossible dilemma because our state constitution forbids the use of public funds to pay for these procedures. To avoid violating the state constitution but still be consistent with federal mandates, state officials must either (1) withdraw from the Medicaid program and forfeit hundreds of millions of dollars in federal funds, thereby denying thousands of low income Colorado residents access to needed medical care or (2) face contempt citations from federal judges. This problem could have been avoided if federal officials clearly understood their own responsibility to protect state prerogatives.

The federal "motor voter" law presents a different type of intrusion. This law doesn't treat States just like the private sector, it actually imposes special burdens simply because they are States. As the Supreme Court recognized in Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112
